

THE GOOD CHILD

Yell-Free Parenting Kit

Workshop booklet

Led by Eman Ahmed @ emansedcorner

Contents

Welcome and intention	3
The moment before the yell	5
Understanding reactive yelling	7
Yelling is the tip of the iceberg	8
Why willpower breaks under pressure	10
What your child experiences beyond your words	13
Knowing better and accessing what you know	15
Designing the life that supports your parenting	17
The workshop invitation	20
Closing reflection	21
Sources	22

Welcome and intention

As-salamu alaykum wa rahmatullahi wa barakatuh. Rabbish rahli sadri, wa yassir li amri, wahlul uqdatan min lisani, yafqahu qawli.

Welcome, my awesome parents, to a long-overdue workshop. I was supposed to do this workshop on yelling because it is one of the things parents most frequently ask me for support with. I don't usually like to address it on its own, and you're going to find out why today.

Last year, I decided, "Let me support parents with exactly what they're asking for." I told you I was going to run this workshop, but I wasn't able to. Fortunately, it was for a good reason: I found out I was pregnant. Unfortunately, I got really sick with hyperemesis gravidarum. This was my fifth pregnancy like that, and it was debilitating.

Alhamdulillah, I had my beautiful baby girl a few months ago. I am four months postpartum and trying to get back on track. Right now, I am clocked in. I need to record this as fast as I can because I have a catnapper! She is with her dad, and currently she is the entire household's manager.

If we haven't met, my name is Eman. I have five kids of my own. I am an early childhood specialist and former primary grade teacher. I quit teaching in 2020, when COVID happened, and decided to bring my field expertise online full time. I support parents with Islamic-led parenting, with a focus on identity upbringing.

In my opinion, the first years of life are where identity is formed. Sure, we can make changes later on, but the blueprint happens in the early years. I want parents to pay attention to what is happening in their homes, with themselves and with their children, during these foundational years of their children's lives and their own lives as well.

Reset your intentions

Before we get started, let's reset our intentions. I love a win-win situation. We are learning how to become the best versions of ourselves, support our children, and have good relationships with them. We also want to be rewarded for this incredibly hard work so that, inshallah, parenting can be a form of worship.

The Prophet, sallallahu alayhi wa sallam, taught us that the best of us are the best to our families. This is us taking action on that teaching, inshallah, and following his example. [1]

Take a moment, take a deep breath, and ground yourself. "Ya Rab, please reward me for this work I am doing. Reward me for every minute I sit here trying to learn how to become a better parent and a better leader to this soul I have to steward."

Know your big why

I ask this in every training, class, workshop, and masterclass: What is your big why? Why are you here today? Why do you feel compelled to listen to a workshop about yelling? What is stirred inside you?

If you can have a pen and paper next to you, I highly encourage you to do that. By the end of the workshop, I want you to go back to your why and ask, “Did I gain any perspective shifts? Did I gain any tangible steps that can serve this why?”

We live in the age of information. It is everywhere. AI is everywhere. It really costs nothing to get information. But information in and of itself will not change anything until we take action. Once it turns into action, we can build our knowledge base. Knowledge is not just information; it is integrated action as well.

I want you to walk away knowing your why and having one takeaway you can implement. In the workshop viewing room, there is a Share Your Feedback button. Please share your takeaway with me because it gives me insight into how what I presented helped you.

Full transparency: I will also share information about my program, designed for the first twelve years of life, for you and your child. It is my brainchild and has been running for over four years. If you know my signature program, Forming Early Foundations, this is the next level. It is a possible next step in supporting yourself as the leader and parent you are meant to be.

Whenever I pose a question, please join the conversation. Type in the chat. There is also a box for questions, and I will get back to you via email, inshallah. If you see me looking down, I'm looking at my handy-dandy laptop to stay on track. Lord knows I can go off on tangents and talk about parenting for hours! To respect my time and yours, let's get started. Bismillah.

The moment before the yell

I want you to think of a moment called “before the yell.” Close your eyes and remember a time, whether it was today, yesterday, or a week ago. What did you feel in the moment before you yelled?

That is where I want us to focus: what happens before the yell. Maybe you yelled a minute ago. Maybe it is happening right now: “Please be quiet. I'm trying to listen to this workshop!” Whatever it is, take a moment to think about how you felt.

How many of you would love to get through the hardest moments of parenting without becoming a version of yourself you regret five minutes later? I'm not talking about a mother who never feels angry. There is no such thing. I mean a mother who can be tired, rushed, overstimulated, and challenged, and still have access to the best version of herself.

If you are here, I know you want change. You care so much. You love your kids so much, and the last thing you want is to ruin your relationship with them. Yet, with all that care and knowledge, there are moments when you find yourself in the same cycle.

You yell. You feel guilty. You tell yourself, “I'm not going to do this again. I don't want to feel this guilt. I'm going to do better.” The next moment arrives, and you don't do better. You yell again and feel guilty again. If you are in this vicious cycle, put it in the chat: “Yes, me too.” We are in this together.

Today, I want to help you break that cycle. If you have an open mind and are willing to take action, I want to give you a different perspective and share a shift that can make all the difference, inshallah.

The shoes example

Imagine a typical day when you have somewhere to be. You ask your child to put on their shoes three times in a row. They are not budging. They are still playing. You look at the time and realize you are running late. You needed your child in the car with their shoes on five minutes ago.

You feel worried, panicked, and rushed. Your body tightens. Your voice starts to change. Your tone shifts, and you feel heat in your body. Pay attention to how that sequence started.

When you first asked, you were cool as a cucumber: “Honey, go put on your shoes.” Then, “Shoes on.” You tried another way: “Hey, we're going to be late. Let's try to get in the car. Put on your shoes, please.” Maybe you said it in a friendly way. Maybe you made eye contact. Still, your child was immersed in play.

This probably sounds like something mothers experience every day, multiple times a day. When that mother finally snaps and says, “How many times do I need to tell you to put on your shoes?” would you label her a bad mother? None of us would. Yet at the end of the day, you look at yourself in the mirror and say, “I’m not a good mother because I yelled at my child.”

The better question is: What happened between the first request and the yell?

Now imagine the next day, with the same scenario. This time, you feel the pressure building but have enough space to choose differently. Does this moment need firmness? Help? A consequence? Less talking and more connection? Do I need to avoid making this an issue right now? Cancel my plans? Adjust my plans?

That is the outcome we are trying to achieve: enough awareness to choose differently. I don’t want to sell you the fantasy of being permanently calm. I want you to remain the leader you are meant to be, especially when things are difficult and there is pressure.

Parenting leadership is most needed when we are dysregulated and the child is pushing back. If that is the mother you want to be, able to lead herself in a moment like that, type “me” in the chat. I want you to participate. The conversation box is there because I don’t want you to learn passively.

What is underneath your wish to stop yelling

Why does it matter to you not to yell? Every family, parent, and child is different, so I want your answer.

Maybe you don’t want your child to be afraid of you. Maybe you hate seeing them copy your tone with their siblings. Maybe you grew up with yelling parents and promised yourself you would not do the same. Maybe you want to feel closer to your children. Maybe you are exhausted from apologizing for the same thing and doing it all over again, because a real apology comes with real change.

There are no wrong answers. Listen to the words underneath. Most mothers are not simply trying to remove a loud voice from the house. They are trying to become someone they can trust in the moments that need their leadership.

Understanding reactive yelling

This is not going to be a shaming session. I want to acknowledge two things. First, not all yelling is bad. Second, we need to acknowledge temperament.

Yelling is a learned behavior, whereas temperament is your innate disposition, how Allah subhanahu wa ta'ala created you. Some people are cool, and some are more hot-headed. I have siblings who can be set off by one word, while another sibling would not bat an eye.

It is not fair to shame one person and praise another without recognizing those differences. Both are valuable and unique. Both need support; the support looks different. At the same time, if we excuse all yelling as temperament or stress, we lose responsibility. We want the middle path.

There is also a difference between yelling and a raised tone. A raised tone can communicate firmness, direction, and discipline. Yelling can be productive in a moment when safety is at risk. We have to introduce nuance rather than overly generalizing, "I shouldn't yell at my kids."

Ask instead: When is my voice serving leadership? When is it serving protection? When is it serving connection? When is it simply a sign that my nervous system has taken over? That last kind, the yelling that takes us outside our character, is what we want to pay attention to.

An identity ache

The reason I hesitated to conduct a workshop on yelling is that when someone says, "I want to stop yelling," to me it signals an identity ache.

It is usually, "I don't want to be that person. I don't want to be the mother who scares her child. I don't want to be the parent whose child responds only from fear. I don't want my home to run on my volume. I don't want my relationship with my children to feel fractured after every hard moment."

The yelling we are addressing is reactive communication that creates distance, fear, shame, and regret. When parents say, "I want to stop yelling," what they often mean is, "I want to lead, correct, direct, discipline, and get my kids to cooperate without leaving myself behind."

A lot of content about not yelling treats it as a one-size-fits-all problem: "Here's a script," or "Here are ten things you can do." It sounds logical, but we are still stuck in the cycle. My job today is to help you break it as effectively as possible, and I hope Allah subhanahu wa ta'ala allows me to do that.

Yelling is the tip of the iceberg

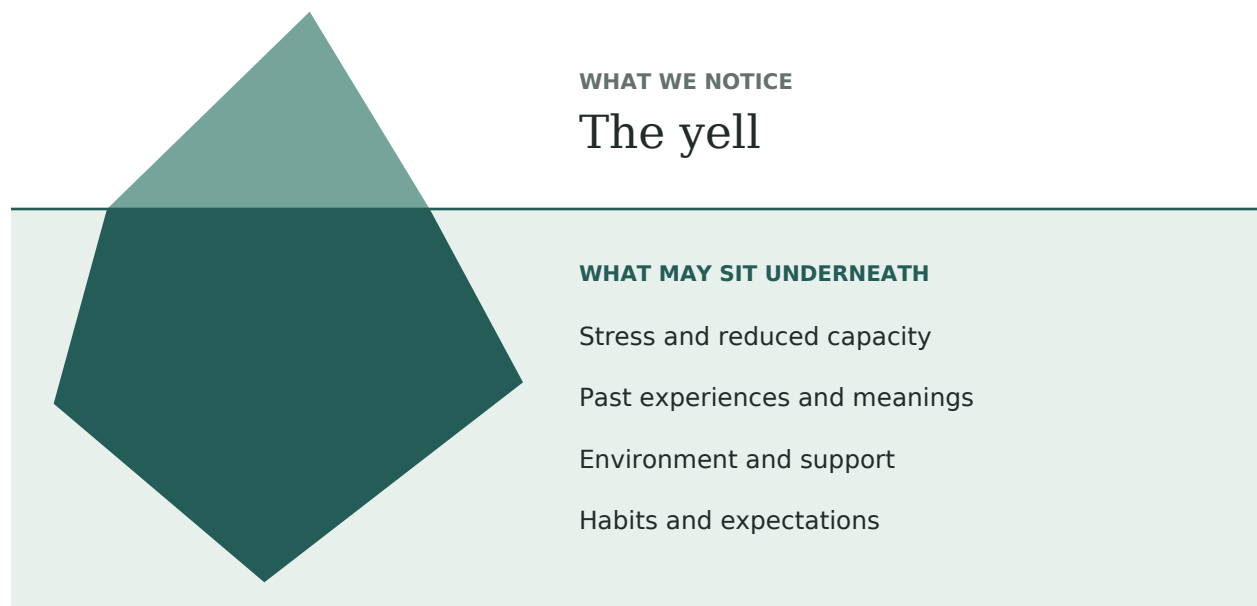

I have to pull out my whiteboard to talk about three main ideas that will help you gain perspective and, inshallah, break the cycle.

The first is this: when someone comes to me and says, “My issue is yelling,” they think they need to solve one small block. “Just help me stop this.” What they don't realize is that it goes a lot deeper. Yelling is the tip of the iceberg.

If you have taken courses and workshops to stop yelling and are still doing it, your yelling has roots. There is more happening that needs awareness, attention, and support in order to address what you see at the surface.

The second idea is a common one: “I yell because my kid is not listening. I wouldn't have yelled if my kid had just listened.” How many of us have said that? You might even say it to your kids. We think it is a listening or communication problem, but there is something else happening that we need to understand.

The third idea is about skills: “The skill set I have is causing me to yell, so I need a different skill set.” We think we need to get from here to there. But underneath that is another issue: self-trust.

Visual 1 The iceberg metaphor. Possible contributors named in the workshop; they will differ between families.

Your good parenting needs to survive stress

When parents tell me, “I just want to stop yelling. I want to be calmer,” they are looking at the tip of the iceberg. Yelling is a symptom rather than the core issue.

You might think, “Then I need to learn how to be calm.” But how many times have you tried? How successful were you? Did it last? We have to look at the roots. Those roots can include your inner child, how your parents parented you, your environment, and a lack of support. It is usually not just one thing.

We cannot explore every possible cause today, so I want to focus on something that makes a big difference: self-trust. You want to trust that the mother who shows up when everyone is regulated is still available when things get hard. You want your good parenting to survive stress.

You want to trust that when your child is not cooperating, you will not immediately lose yourself, your values, your compassion, or your authority. This goes deeper than calm. Calm is a feeling. Self-trust is an identity.

Self-trust says, “Even when I am activated, I have built enough awareness, structure, and leadership that I am not entirely at the mercy of the moment.” Hold onto that. We will come back to it.

Why willpower breaks under pressure

A lot of parents respond by saying, “I’m going to try harder. I’m going to be more patient. Take a deep breath. Count to ten. Use a gentle script. Walk away. I’m not going to yell.”

None of those tools are inherently ineffective. They can help. But they assume the main problem is what you do at the end. Once you are already flooded, interpreting what your child is doing in a particular way, and almost at a ten, you are supposed to reach into your toolbox and select the perfect response.

That calls on your willpower in a heated moment. Your child is not listening for the fifth time, your voice is ramping up, and you are being told to do something that requires a lot of willpower. This is why we keep coming back to the cycle, even though we know better.

Remember this: willpower parenting breaks under pressure. A lot of yelling advice is like telling you how to stop a train when it is already arriving at the station at full speed. Willpower matters, but it is not reliable under pressure.

If your plan for not yelling works only when you are well rested, supported, resourced, and your children are cooperating, my moms, that is you having a good day. We need something that supports us when the day is hard, too.

The yell begins before the sound

We need to pay attention to what happens before we yell. The sound comes out of your mouth at the end, but the reaction may have started hours ago, or even yesterday. You make something mean something, and your body catches up with it.

If you want to change the pattern, study what happens before the yell. There is what happens, there is what you do, and between them there is a window. When we are well resourced, calm, and comfortable, that window can feel huge.

That window is where parenting leadership lives. It is where you notice, interpret, and pay attention to how you are interpreting. It is where your body starts mobilizing and where there are still opportunities to change course. In that moment there is choice: the choice to respond differently.

A lesson about staying away from the edge

This is a principle I connect to divine guidance. In the Qur'an, Allah subhanahu wa ta'ala tells us not to go near zina. Think also of Adam, alayhi as-salam, and the instruction not to approach the tree. [2]

The lesson I draw is that we should not wait until we are standing in front of temptation and rely only on willpower. In our situation, we do not want to be at the edge of the yell, trying to figure out whether to take a walk, breathe deeply, or talk to our child differently.

That is why my favorite way of parenting is parenting by divine design. Shameless plug: that is also the name of my program for those who want to take the next step with me! For now, let's continue.

Instead of studying only what happened when you yelled, ask: What was happening before? What was I carrying? How was I feeling? What was my child's behavior, and what did it mean to me? What story did I give it? What did I notice in my body? What impulse started growing?

Sometimes you realize you interpreted your child not listening for the fifth time as disrespect, when perhaps they did not hear or understand. Because of your own past, you gave it a meaning, and your body reacted to that unconscious or subconscious narrative.

Separate the layers

Write these questions down. First, what actually happened? What is the observable event, described as objectively as possible?

Second, what did I make it mean? What story did I create? There is a difference between my interpretation or opinion and the actual facts.

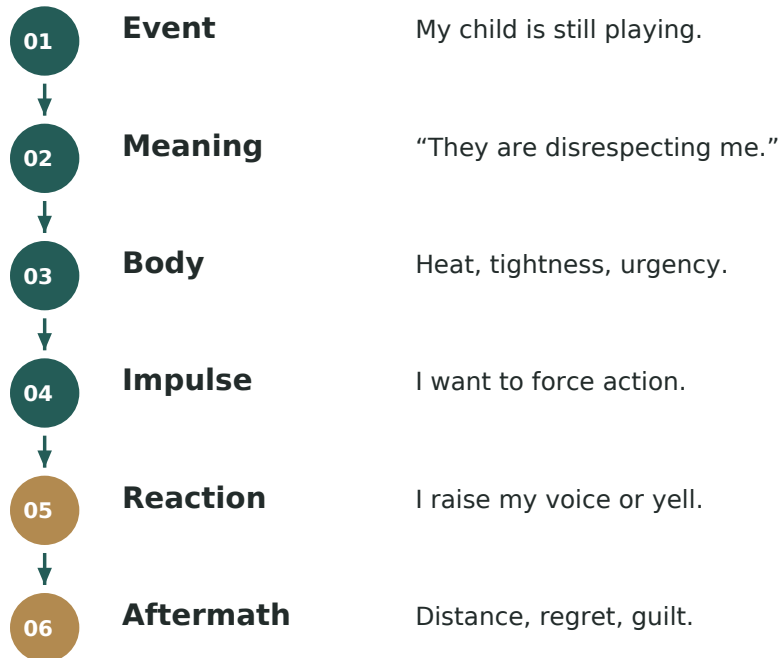

Third, what happened inside my body? Where did I feel a knot, heat, urgency, or tension?

Finally, what did I do next?

That is how we separate “something is happening within me” from “my child made me do it.” As you practice, you start noticing yourself at twenty or thirty rather than only at one hundred, when you are already yelling at everybody.

You want enough awareness to say, “I'm getting to fifty. What needs to change? What needs to shift?” Do I need to take a step back? Remove something from my list? Change plans? What can I adjust before I get to one hundred? That is leadership.

The sequence at a glance

Earlier awareness creates more opportunities to choose.

Visual 2 The workshop's six-part sequence, illustrated with the shoes example. This is a teaching model, not a fixed biological sequence.

Four questions from the workshop

What actually happened?

Describe the observable event.

What did I make it mean?

Separate the fact from your interpretation.

What happened in my body?

Notice heat, tension, urgency, or a knot.

What did I do next?

Look for where a different choice could begin.

What your child experiences beyond your words

Now that we have talked about awareness, let's look at the idea that your child's lack of cooperation is the reason you yelled. I want to illustrate something using the Moro reflex.

When a pediatrician checks a baby, one thing they look at is the baby's startle response. If you have seen it, you might think, "Why are you freaking the baby out?" But the reflex helps clinicians assess the baby's nervous system. [3]

The lesson I want you to take is that human beings can have organized, automatic responses before conscious reasoning has a chance to lead the process. Nobody had to teach that baby to respond to a sudden change. Allah subhanahu wa ta'ala created us with protective responses by design.

Have you ever walked into a room and had a gut feeling? You can react to signals before you have consciously made sense of them. In the workshop, I use the baby's reflex as an illustration of that automatic response. Think of a baby startling with a change in position, and of how parents try to help them feel settled.

Your presence matters

How is this relevant when you say, "My child isn't listening. I asked a hundred times, kept my cool, and they still aren't cooperating"? Your child is also responding to how you show up in the room.

It is about more than what you say. This is why child development matters. You need to understand yourself and your child, including what your child may be reacting to that you have not noticed.

Learning about development can create a pause. It supports the awareness we discussed and helps you ask, "What is my child responding to automatically?" That helps you meet your child where they are. It is about your presence as well as your words and scripts.

If you have taken my Parenting with No Regrets workshop or Shifting the Islamic Parenting Paradigm, you will have heard me say that parenting is about how your children experience you: how you show up and what you embody.

A process with several parts

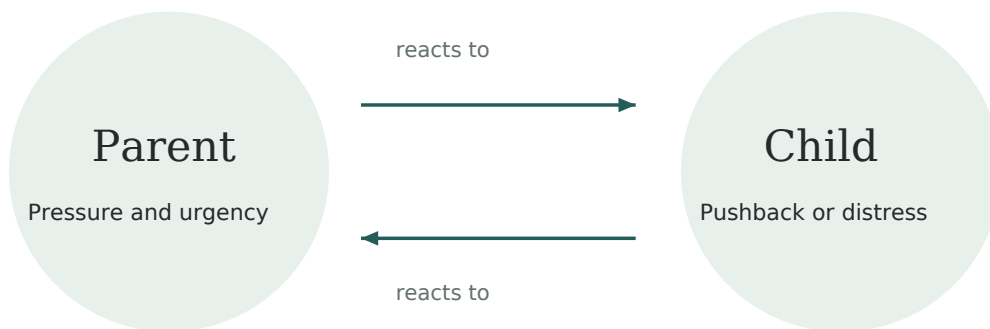

As we grow, our responses become more complex. We can look at a trigger, the meaning we give it, how it activates our body, the impulse we feel, the reaction, and the aftermath. Notice where the yell sits: in the reaction, towards the end.

This is why focusing only on the yell creates frustration. We keep trying to address a six-part process at the fifth part.

On a Tuesday morning, you are asking your child to put on their shoes, use the bathroom, or brush their teeth. They are not doing it, and you already have a million mental tabs open. You react to the environment, and your child reacts to you. You can end up inside a loop of two nervous systems reacting to one another.

When you say, “They made me yell,” what may be happening is that you are both dysregulated and feeding off each other. A script alone may not land while that is happening. You need to pay attention to your own state.

Look deeper, and it may not really be about the shoes or the teeth brushing. You may be sleep deprived, lack support, or simply be having a hard day. All of these can reduce your capacity and make you more sensitive, drawing your child into the loop.

A possible interruption

Notice your state / Pause / Adjust the demand or support

Visual 3 The parent-child reaction loop. A parent's pause can change the interaction; it does not guarantee immediate cooperation.

The opposite of reactive parenting, as I am using it here, is choice: enough awareness, structure, and space to say, “I can pause and choose differently.”

Instead of acting on my anger, I can ground myself. I can make wudu. I can say istighfar. I can figure out what is contributing to this, pivot, and adjust my day. That ability to respond differently is what I want us to build.

Knowing better and accessing what you know

That brings us to “I know better, but I still reacted.” You may have skills but struggle to access them in the moment.

I can tell you firsthand: as someone who studies children, I still have days when I yell, raise my tone, and get frustrated. Expertise and knowing better do not translate into doing better at all times. Doing something is a different skill from knowing something.

Instead of entering the shame cycle of “I know better; I should have done better,” ask a better question: “What makes me lose access to what I already know?”

Maybe your life is too full. Maybe you need to change something in your routines or schedule. Maybe you need more support. That question can give you more useful information than memorizing another skill or getting another book.

The traps that keep us stuck

One trap is trying to stop the yell at the moment of yelling rather than catching the buildup. We rely on willpower rather than designing the conditions that help us make better choices as leaders, especially when things do not go our way. Earlier awareness creates more choices.

Another trap is confusing knowing better with doing better. Once you learn something, put it into practice. Refine it. See what works and what does not. That becomes a body of knowledge around which you can continue building skills.

When you are about to shame yourself, ask, “What was missing between what I knew and what I did?” That question applies to you and your child.

We also get stuck in the loop of escalating each other and conclude, “My child isn’t listening, therefore I have to yell.” When you work on de-escalating yourself, you can help change the interaction and create room to access what you know before you reach the point of relying only on willpower.

A further trap is making calm the goal. Calm is a feeling that comes and goes. It is like good weather. The goal is having choices that come from leadership you have prepared and practiced.

Triggers will still exist. One day it is shoes, another day back talk, another day crying. But you can learn to observe what happens, notice the meaning you give it, and recognize your body's activation and impulse. That gives you space to respond.

Build discernment through practice

This is good news: you do not have to memorize scripts or become a parent who does not feel like you. By understanding your own patterns, you can build and refine skills, then use them when you need them.

That is why I am not giving you a list of “say this, do this, don't do that.” What is the point of giving you a perfectly orchestrated sentence you cannot access in the heat of the moment? I want you to understand what is happening more deeply and discern how best to support yourself and your child.

Willpower parenting says, “I will decide what kind of parent I need to be in that moment. I will learn all this information and save it for then.” Instead, take the information and design it into your life. Practice it before the moment hits, before you need to call on it.

The question is not only how to have stronger willpower. It is how to reduce our dependence on willpower.

Designing the life that supports your parenting

What replaces willpower? That question changed the way I built my work. If I cannot rely on inventing parenting decisions in my hardest moments, what do I need?

I need to decide more before the moment. I need to know what matters and what I want. I need structures around predictable friction, discernment, frameworks, and practice. Ultimately, I need design.

What changed in my own home

My life looks drastically different from five years ago. Alhamdulillah, I can say that I am living my dream life. Five years ago, I was chasing my tail every day. I yelled more than I wanted to. I was overworked, frustrated, and lacked the support systems I needed.

I chased perfect parenting through books, experts, talks, and trends. I felt burned out until one day I said, "I cannot sustain this." I kept having more kids and could not keep chasing the latest mom hack.

I stepped back from what I call mainstream parenting and returned to the Qur'an and Sunnah. I began designing my life around that, and it has been the best thing I have done. Advice and best practices can feel like a moving target: one day something is good, the next day it is bad.

For me, the Qur'an and Sunnah are a timeless compass and framework, connected to why we are here and our purpose in this world and the akhirah. I wanted that to guide the life I was building.

What did it look like? Quitting my job, staying home with my kids, home educating them, and sharing my expertise online. It looked like fewer activities, a slower pace, and more support.

It looked like a fluid rhythm instead of timetables and charts we had to check off. It looked like curricula that met us, instead of the other way around. It resulted in a life I honestly cannot believe is mine, alhamdulillah, and children who lead themselves.

I described it as waking up without fretting over what my kids need to do because everyone knows what they need to do. That did not happen without effort. It took hard decisions, sacrifices, unlearning, and a lot of dua. It took putting my blinders on, focusing on my own family, and deciding how I wanted to raise them.

Not everyone will tell you about that part, and not everyone is willing to do it. If you want a life that few people live, you have to be willing to do things that few people do. In a nutshell, it happened by design.

Make decisions before urgency takes over

If you want to stop yelling, you need a life that holds you. You are human and multifaceted, with many responsibilities and things you want to do.

As Muslim parents, we also want to teach aqidah, salah, good habits, and Islamic character. How do we do that when we spend all day feeling guilty because we yelled for the fifth time? I am speaking from personal experience when I say that intentional decisions rooted in the Qur'an and Sunnah have changed this for me.

Instead of waking up hoping you have enough patience, design your parenting. Decide how you want to lead before your child tests the boundary. Decide what matters before emotions and urgency take over. Design routines around predictable friction.

Think about your language, consequences, repair, and what your family culture is trying to produce. I call this parenting by divine design: foundations that are developmentally based and rooted in the Qur'an and Sunnah for the first twelve years of life. We lead on purpose.

Three areas to work on

First, ask what matters. Who are you raising? What values are you protecting? What is non-negotiable? What kind of mother do you want to be?

Second, design your home. Where are the predictable frustrations? Which routines, expectations, boundaries, rhythms, and systems can reduce unnecessary battles?

Third, practice your leadership. Design is not a binder on a shelf. It is repetition and putting in the reps. It is learning to stay intentional when your child is not connecting or cooperating. It is developing discernment so your parenting has support beyond whether you slept eight hours or feel patient today.

01

What matters

Values

Identity

Non-negotiables

02

Your home

Routines

Expectations

Predictable friction

03

Your leadership

Practice

Discernment

Refinement

Prepare before the moment. Practice in daily life.

Visual 4 The three areas of design described in the workshop.

Three possible paths from here

You can continue relying on willpower, hoping it will sustain you. You can keep collecting information and knowing more, yet get stuck when you need to do better. Or you can do the work to design the life you want as a parent and the life you want for your children.

The third path is where you build structures, decisions, and responses before you need them. It is the one I believe in because I have seen the fruits of that labor. My eldest is thirteen, a teenager I am incredibly proud of. He is in high school and nearing completion of his Qur'an memorization. He is compassionate, sweet, and gentle. Allahumma barik. May Allah increase and preserve him.

I am not speaking to you with a twenty-year-old, completely out of the early years. I am sharing what I have practiced over thirteen years as a parent and what those actions have led to.

Instead of waiting for the next crisis to decide who you want to be, make decisions beforehand. Build a framework you can stand on. Develop the discernment to know what your child and the moment need.

Build structures that hold you. This past year, I had a debilitating pregnancy, yet alhamdulillah, my home was still flowing because I had put structures in place that could hold me when I was not at my best. That is why I built Parenting by Divine Design, and why I am extending it to you.

The workshop invitation

In Parenting by Divine Design, we work on three areas: you, the child, and the home. You get to know yourself and increase your education and skills as a parent. You understand what your child needs and build foundations for a strong Islamic identity. You learn how to design your home to support your family.

We do that together with my support for an entire year. It includes your parenting education and coaching, plus your child's education, done for you and taught directly by me. I teach the fundamental Islamic education I believe children need before age thirteen.

Who this program is for

This program is not for everybody. It is not for you if you want a quick trick to make your child instantly comply. It is not for you if you believe your child is always the problem, if you want no discomfort, boundaries, or accountability, or if you want more information without changing anything about your life.

It is for you if you want parenting to become your worship and legacy. You learn, design, implement, get feedback, integrate, and refine. The work includes both you and your child.

I will email you the details of Parenting by Divine Design, including how to join.

The program is an intimate support experience. You get direct WhatsApp access to me for twelve months, helping you parent in real time and apply what we have discussed to your situation.

You also join a community of mothers who are deeply invested in raising their children. This relationship has a beginning and no end; it is a responsibility we will be asked about and one we carry into our akhirah.

A parenting home you can return to

I have been running this program for over four years. Parents who joined still return to it. I designed it to be your parenting home from birth to puberty, for the first twelve years.

The goal is not to become a perfect parent. You are saying yes to divine leadership, self-trust, intentional boundaries, repair without shame, and leadership you can access under pressure.

If part of you says, "I should be able to do this myself," you are capable. But as we have discussed, knowing something and accessing it when you need it are different. That is where we begin.

Closing reflection

If there is one conclusion I want you to leave with, it is this: you do not need to become a fully healed, finished human before you can lead a developing one.

We want to design an early-years parenting life that holds both your development and your child's growth. Stop designing your parenting only in the moment. Design it beforehand, with divine wisdom.

That is how I want to help you break the cycle of yelling, guilt, “I’ll do better,” and yelling again.

If the program speaks to you, I encourage you to join. It was lovely talking with you. I pray you walked away with something tangible. Please share your feedback and your takeaway. If you have questions, leave them in the question box or email team@thegoodchild.org.

I cannot wait to speak with you again, somewhere online or in another workshop, inshallah. Take care, and as-salamu alaykum.

Sources

1 Being best to one's family

Jami at-Tirmidhi 3895

<https://sunnah.com/tirmidhi:3895>

2 The Qur'anic examples

Surah Al-Isra 17:32 and Surah Al-Baqarah 2:35

<https://quran.com/17/32>

<https://quran.com/2/35>

3 The Moro reflex

MedlinePlus Medical Encyclopedia: Moro reflex

<https://medlineplus.gov/ency/article/003293.htm>